The Official Mission Statements of Most American Schools

The official mission statements of most American schools begin with:

"The purpose of our school is to prepare our students for success in life."
In the absence of a clear definition and understanding of the role of public education, there is a risk of misinterpretation and misuse of educational resources. The central issue is the balance between the interests of students, parents, and society. The current education system is facing significant challenges, including funding shortages, curriculum rigidities, and teaching methodologies that do not cater to diverse learning needs. The need for reform is apparent, and it requires a comprehensive approach that addresses both the structural and ideological aspects of education. This involves promoting a culture of continuous learning, fostering critical thinking skills, and ensuring equitable access to quality education. The stakeholders must work together to create a system that is responsive to the needs of students and prepares them for the challenges of the future.
ENGLISH TEXT

It is simple and obvious. Let them manage themselves.

The solution, I think, is a combination of education and guidance. The guidelines I have in mind are not legal but voluntary. They aim to train a generation of educated men and women. These are my guidelines:

1. Why does one think that school is boring and tedious? How does one's

2. How can one make children enjoy school and learning?

3. How can one make education work for them?

4. What is the role of the teacher?

5. What can parents do to help their children learn?

6. How can one make education fun and interesting?

7. What is the role of the school board?

8. How can one make education work for society?

9. What is the role of the community?

10. How can one make education work for the individual?

By following these guidelines, we can create a generation of educated men and women who will be able to manage themselves and their communities. This will lead to a more prosperous and stable society.